Tuesday, as we reported, was Law Day, and many judges and lawyers took to old school forms of communication - the podium, the newspaper opinion pages - to reach out to citizens about the importance of the rule of law. So we have to hand it to two judges on the District of Columbia Superior Court and the D.C. Court of Appeals, Lee Satterfield and Eric Washington, for taking to Twitter. The judges spent an hour on the social media site on Tuesday, the Blog of Legal Times reports, answering questions about everything from cameras in the courts (not allowed) to -- talk about meta -- whether tweeting was allowed (unclear). And for the record: Law Day does not mean the other days of the year are about lawlessness (a reporter asked if that was the case). "Just like Mother's Day, Law Day is one day to be thankful that the rule of law is cherished in this country," the judges Tweeted.
